OLD VIRGINIA LOVE TALE.

Plantation Lovers Joined After Nearly

Forty Years. An old colored man appeared at the clerk's office yesterday and applied for a license to marry. His age must have been up near the limit of the alloted score. But his figure was straight, and even the white nap on his head lost some of his aged look when one saw his eyes bright with excitewhen one saw his eyes bright with excitement, for Susanna had consented to be his wife. When questioned as to why he had wadled so long to enter the path of matrimony, he said he had been the victim of circumstances. That a fate more cruel than befalls the lot of one in a thousand bad true his true ks and left sand had trod upon his tracks and left him the ashes of a love unfulfilled. Before the war, or during the war, he had loved Susanna. All the preparations for a grand plantation wedding were in progress. The old man remembers every progress. The old man remembers every plan of the details of getting ready. When suddenly the war closed. The negroes ran in a panic from the Yankees, and he was hiding in the woods when Sheridan came through with his tream. through with his troops. He, in company with another negro, lived on anything they could get for four days. Then they stole back to the plantation. There everything was changed.

The negroes were scattered and their homes broken up. Some had gone with the northern troops and some had gone off to feel the air of their new freedom. The old nomestead of his master had been burned. homestead of his master had been burned. A few of the slaves remained, and from these he learned that Susanna, believing him caught up and killed or made a servant by the Yankee-this was the negroes unreasoning idea in many cases returned that their cases are the state of the cases of the c garding Sheridan and his troops, that they were inhuman and cruel-had followed her young mistress to Richmond, where the family went after the home place had been destroyed.

He worked on a neighboring plantation for three years and got enough money to go to Richmond to look for Susanna. He got there, but, in his ignorance, could make no intelligible inquiries. So she was make no intelligible inquiries. So she was lest to him. He tor was the negro's name; went back to the county where he originally came from and has worked there ever since. Susanna followed the fortunes of her young mistress, and has been the mammy" in the family for nearly forty mammy in the lamily for nearly forty years. Three weeks ago the lady, in com-pany with Susanna as attendant, went back to the old plantation. That is, she went back to look at the old home place. The farm had long been sold and divided up, but the old streams were the same and there were many old landmarks that had stood the ravages of forty years. Hector was working for a farmer on part of the

He owned a little tract himself and "worked on shears" a few acres of the big farm. He had remained true to his wit live and had never married, a fact very singular, for the negro is easily con-soled in his love affairs that have gone wrong. He and Susanna happened to meet the old place, and the love of their youth

The lady heard the story of the first love and the separation and furnished Susanna with a grand outfit for the wedding, besides making out Hector a present of what sides making old Hector a present of what seemed to him a small fortune in money. The marriage took place last night, and Susanna's mistress came and witnessed the ceremony.—Roanoke Times.

She discharged her cargo and was back in Hampton Roads Saturday night. With luck she will sail from here to-morrow night with another cargo. When it comes to sailing, Captain Clausen says that the schooner Edward Smith is the smartest vessel on the coast. The Smith and the Brooks, on the last voyage from Norfolk, went out in company, "There was a cracking breeze," Captain Clausen said to-day, " and I thought I'd give him all that was coming to him, but I was nowhere. He sailed me out of sight in six hours, and there aint another vessel on the coast that could have done it. I could not stand the breeze, though, and had to reef mainsail and double reef foresail. Cap'n Sears, he just tuck had to reef mainsail and double reef foresail. Cap'n Sears, he just tuck it and went a flyin'."—I'ortsmouth Star.
